

Citations

A quick guide to doing citations for academic research and projects

Cheat Sheet

Why do I need to cite?

- To credit the works that you have consulted
- Show evidence of the extent and depth of your research
- Validate and increase credibility of your arguments
- Help readers trace the origin of ideas and locate the works

In addition, citations are important in helping you avoid charges of plagiarism.

Plagiarism:

Plagiarism is an act of academic dishonesty. The Cambridge University (2011) defines it as "submitting as one's own work, irrespective of intent to deceive, that which derives in part or in its entirety from the work of others without due acknowledgement".

There are in-text citations, where you put in the citations directly in your text.

For example,

Smith (2005) found that "many students regard copying small amount of work without citing as a trivial matter" (p.29).

Citations placed at the end of the text are referred to as a 'References', or 'Works Cited' page – where you list down the collated sources that you have used.

When do I need to cite?

- When you use an idea from an author
- When using direct quotations or definitions from another work
- When using illustrations, tables and statistics from other sources
- When describing a particular theory or model
- When paraphrasing another person's work and writing something that is not of common knowledge

* Note that this list is not exhaustive. You can consult handbooks for academic research listed at the end for further details on when to cite.

What are the components involved in a reference citation?

- Author
- Title of work
- Year of Publication
- Publisher
- Place of Publishing
- Page Number (if relevant)

The above consists of the key aspects of information that you will need to include to form a proper book citation. The order where you arrange these components will differ according to the style of citation.

Here is an example of an APA citation:

Is there a standardised way of citing?

A range of different referencing styles exists. Different disciplines and institutions may adopt a different form of citation. However, the way of citing is fixed within each style of citation.

This cheatsheet highlights the 3 most common styles of citation – MLA, APA and Chicago style.

	 MLA	 APA	 CMS
Overview	The Modern Language Association of America (MLA) is mostly used in Humanities subjects such as Literature.	The American Psychological Association (APA) is preferred in most Social Sciences courses, including Psychology.	The Chicago Manual of Style (CMS) tends to be preferred by History majors.

Searching for Information on Citations

Step 1:

Take note of which style of citation is preferred by your teacher or school.

Step 2:

Search for materials related to citations using keywords such as 'citation'. If you are looking for a specific style of citing, type in the particular style such as 'APA citation'.

Print Materials in the Library

Tip: You can locate most of the materials on citation at the library section with the call number series of 800.
